

War in Iraq Claims Life of Canisius Professor

Hostile fire claimed the life of Canisius College friend and colleague Lt. Col. Terrence Crowe on June 7. Crowe, an assistant professor of military science at Canisius, was a reservist with the Rochester-based U.S. Army Reserve's 98th Division. He was serving as part of offensive operations in Tal Afar, Iraq at the time of his death. Crowe was 44 years old.

At Canisius, Crowe was assigned to the 8th Brigade, 98th Division and worked as an operations and training officer, responsible for training cadets in the junior ROTC class. He was mobilized with the 98th Division (Institutional Training) in October 2004, as part of its Foreign Army Training Assistance Command mission. The 98th Division supports the multi-national security command in Iraq, which is training Iraqi Security Forces. As a member of a Military Transition Team (MTT), Crowe was an advisor to the Iraqi Army.

A veteran of the U.S. Army, Crowe served in the Active, National Guard and Reserve components. He earned his regular Army commission from Niagara University and served on active duty from September 1982 – September 1992, in Germany and at Fort Hood, TX.

Crowe is survived by his parents and two children.

Canisius Faculty Contribute to Encyclopedia of New York State

Five Canisius College professors can count themselves among the contributors to one of the most complete documents ever to be published about New York State, in a half century. The Encyclopedia of New York State includes nearly 2000 pages and 4000 signed entries that capture the impressive complexity of the Empire State as a historic crossroads of people and ideas.

Those faculty who authored entries in the manuscript include: Rev. Edward T. Dunn, S.J., professor of history (Buffalo, Rochester and Pittsburgh Railway and Buffalo and Susquehanna Railroad); Peter J. Galie, PhD, chair of political science (Rights of New Yorkers, Constitutions & Constitutional Conventions, Libel and John Zenger); Eric L. Gansworth, associate professor of English (American Indians in Literature); Robert A. Klump, adjunct professor of political science (Charles Evans Hughes); and Howard R. Stanger, PhD, associate professor of management/marketing (The Larkin Company).

DR. MICHAEL NOONAN AND STUDENTS IN HIS CANISIUS AMBASSADORS FOR CONSERVATION PROGRAM TRAVELED TO PACIFIC RIM NATIONAL PARK TO STUDY MARINE MAMMAL CONSERVATION.

Marine Mammal Conservation is Focus of Noonan's Summer Study

Biology/Psychology Professor Michael Noonan, PhD, accompanied students in his Canisius Ambassadors for Conservation (CAC) program, to Pacific Rim

National Park in British Columbia this summer, where the group studied marine mammal conservation. Throughout their 11 day trip, Noonan and the students conducted in-depth, on-site studies of seals, sea lions, dolphins, orcas and gray whales, and learned first-hand of the threats to these marine mammals, posed by ship traffic, over-fishing, and water pollution.

Noonan is a recipient of a Peter Canisius Distinguished Professorship, which he used to establish the Canisius Ambassadors for Conservation program. Now in its sixth year, the program takes a select group of students, annually, to distant locations to study wildlife conservation issues.

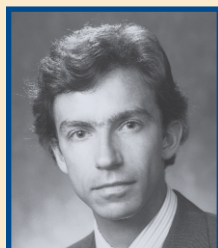

Upon returning from the field, students produce pro-conservation, educational resources about the ecosystems they studied and present at nearby zoological institutions. This summer, Noonan's students are giving educational presentations about marine mammal conservation at the Buffalo Zoo, the Aquarium of Niagara and Marineland in Canada. In their first month of appearances, the CAC garnered a combined audience of more than 40,000 people. Under Noonan's direction, students also produce video documentaries about their research.

Their most recent video documentary, Elephas Maximus: The biology and conservation of the Asian elephant, received three national awards. It was a finalist in the 2005 Telly Awards (education category). It received an award of distinction at the 2005 Videographer Awards (education category). And it won a gold Aurora Award for Issues Awareness, in the documentary category for nature/environment.

Noonan wrote, directed and produced Elephas Maximus. The documentary was filmed by Erik T. Michaelsen and edited by Nathan A. Johnson, of the Canisius College Media Center.

Richard J. Wehle School of Business Recognizes Economics/Finance Professors

The Canisius College Graduate Business Programs of the Richard J. Wehle School of Business recognized two professors in the Economics/Finance Department, for their outstanding work as educators.

Professor Richard A. Shick, PhD, received the Dr. Donald E. Calvert Outstanding Professor Award during the Graduate Business Program's annual cocktail party in May. Recipients of the Calvert Award are full-time MBA professors and selected by students in the program. The award is named for its first recipient, the late Donald Calvert, who was a management professor in the Canisius School of Business Administration for 17 years. Calvert received the Outstanding Professor Award in 1979.

Joseph G. Eisenhauer, PhD, received the second annual Faculty Scholarship Award. The award was established in 2004 by the Richard J. Wehle School of Business to encourage scholarship within the school. Recipients are presented with a $1000 stipend.
